

Part of teaching is trying out new ideas and seeing what works...and what doesn't. Every teacher has successes in the classroom—why not share those successes with other teachers? Hopefully they'll be willing to share theirs as well.

It's EASY to share! Just write about your experiences as if you were telling another teacher. Don't worry about grammar or punctuation; that's our job. Just describe all the components that went into making a success in your classroom: perhaps an activity that provided a true "lightbulb moment" for your students, or maybe a new teaching technique or cross-curricular experiment.

Keep in mind that you are writing for OTHER teachers. Sharing your experiences may help them to achieve more success in their classrooms or laboratories. You can even write about a failure, particularly if you learned something from it that would be of value to others.

Take an hour to write about one of your "Recipes for Success." Keep in mind that having an article published not only helps OTHER teachers, but can help you to promote your program. Wouldn't it be great to show your principal how your ideas are helping teachers around the world?

Email questions or submissions to kdelapaz@iteaconnect.org. We'll accept Word files, text pasted into emails, or even scribbled napkins (if it's really good)!

ITEA is comprised of a very large network of teachers. Share some of that collective brainpower. Put that network to work!
